Hiring Team

Bold

Joining Bold's Ecommerce team feels like a natural next step for me because of my hands-on experience driving growth through data-driven product and pricing strategies. At LITET, I built KPI dashboards and reporting systems that supported pricing, PPC optimization, and bundle experimentation decisions—efforts that increased revenue by 400% year-over-year and improved ROAS significantly. This aligns closely with Bold's focus on optimizing the path to purchase and driving long-term customer lifetime value through experimentation and analytics.

I'm comfortable leading complex projects independently and coordinating across multiple teams, having managed roadmap prioritization and backlog planning for customer-facing platforms at Chamberlain Group. My approach combines deep user understanding with quantitative analysis, using tools like Amplitude and Mixpanel to build funnels, diagnose drop-offs, and prioritize initiatives that balance customer needs with business impact. I've also worked closely with engineering teams to navigate technical tradeoffs and ensure smooth feature delivery, which fits well with Bold's emphasis on technical fluency and cross-functional leadership.

What excites me about this role is the opportunity to contribute to a high-velocity, experimentation-driven environment where continuous A/B testing and data insights shape the user journey. I appreciate Bold's commitment to balancing sustainable revenue growth with intuitive customer experiences, and I'm eager to bring my background in subscription models, pricing strategies, and paywall optimization to help refine and scale your digital storefront.

Overall, I see a strong fit between my experience in growth-focused product management and Bold's mission to deliver a seamless, high-performing ecommerce experience that drives both conversion and retention. I look forward to the possibility of collaborating with your team to push those goals forward.

Sincerely,
Ricardo Lugo
