Hiring Team
Brightside

Brightside's mission to help clients improve their financial health by turning moments of need into sustained engagement resonates with my experience leading complex, user-focused product initiatives. At LITET, I drove growth through analytics-driven optimization and built integrated inventory visibility systems that connected multiple fulfillment channels, improving operational clarity and customer experience. This blend of data-informed decision-making and systems thinking aligns well with Brightside's emphasis on using experimentation and user insights to refine engagement and conversion.

I'm particularly drawn to the opportunity to bridge digital and human support, enabling seamless collaboration between clients and Financial Assistants. My background managing cross-functional teams and coordinating workflows across design, engineering, and operations equips me to lead such efforts effectively. I'm comfortable navigating ambiguity, translating broad ideas into clear product roadmaps, and balancing strategic vision with hands-on execution—skills I honed while owning end-to-end product areas and driving measurable improvements in engagement and operational outcomes.

Brightside's focus on engagement loops and behavior change fits with my experience optimizing activation and retention through targeted messaging and process improvements. I understand the importance of defining success metrics and iterating based on data, and I'm motivated by creating experiences that not only deliver functionality but also guide users toward meaningful actions.

Joining Brightside offers a chance to apply my product management expertise in a fintech environment that values both human empathy and data-driven rigor. I look forward to contributing to your client app's evolution and helping more people take confident steps toward better financial health.

Sincerely,
Ricardo Lugo
